Marching On: In the Thick of Breaking Barriers

As LBC and its ReBuildATL coalition members finish the first structural barn decon, we continue headlong into our next field experiences, eager to support the work of our outstanding trainees! We've highlighted our Breaking Barriers program in past newsletters, but still wondering why it is so critical for our organization and for Atlanta's West End? We sat down with retired EPA Region 4 and current Board of Directors member Jay Bassett for more.

"My hat is off to LBC's Executive director and staff for its vision of LBC working collaboratively with and supporting a network of community facing organizations in better delivering its mission of increasing the reuse and value of building materials and its embodied carbon to help solve wicked problems through opportunities for the community it serves. Its vision of working better together with a shared set of values, interests and capacity is providing a marketable set of sustainability and deconstruction skills for individuals that enhance construction services and management career onramps and pathways while also increasing the capacity and capability to deconstruct and deliver building materials to LBC which are reinvested back into the community that enhances a culture of sustainability and is essential to its vision of being part of a "healthy and thriving community". In its role as a community convenor and connector, LBC has increased its community's resiliency and capacity through coordinated effort of convening and activating community assets (of which LBC is one) and anchor institutions as part of an envisioned transformation to the green economy and decarbonization through a community centered hub and center for material reuse and circularity that the EPA (with the City of Atlanta as part of its climate action plan) had envisioned when LBC was entrusted with and awarded a grant to do workforce development."

Photos and videos of our progress on this and other deconstruction projects during the training can be found on LBC's Instagram feed HERE.
